Introduction

Carwash workers in the Los Angeles area faced serious problems. Their bosses would tell them to show up at a certain time, but wouldn't start paying them until a customer arrived. They didn't make much money, sometimes only tips. Sometimes, they were cheated out of even that. They were refused lunch breaks and issued no protective gear when exposed to dangerous chemicals. Workers reported kidney failure, respiratory problems, and nerve damage.

One of these workers was Bosebely, who worked at Vermont Handwash in Los Angeles for nearly two years as a dryer and detailer. Bosebely and many of his co-workers suffered health effects from using acids and other toxic chemicals without goggles or gloves.

So workers turned to the Community-Labor Environmental Action Network, or CLEAN. With CLEAN's help Bosebely joined his co-workers in taking successful legal action against the owners of the carwash for not paying minimum wage or overtime pay, and not allowing workers to take meal and rest breaks. He also reported the dangerous working conditions to the California Occupational Safety and Health Administration. But as another carwash worker said, "A lawsuit doesn't change anything. You need a union contract to change conditions."

It took two years, but in October 2011 Bonus Car Wash workers became the first in southern California to unionize. Following that victory, workers at two more carwashes voted for unions. These workers received raises, a guarantee of meal breaks, health and safety protection, and grievance procedures through a union contract.

Most workers aren't so lucky. Even when the laws are observed, work in today's economy can be rough. The 2007 Wall Street crash and economic recession that followed left millions of workers without employment. Most of those with jobs don't have the protections that unions provide.

In the U.S., more than one out of four working families with children is low income. In these "working poor" families, people work hard but still can't make ends meet, and are just one or two paychecks from homelessness. These workers at the bottom of the economy are the people who could benefit the most from belonging to a union. But over the past half century, the percentage of union members in the workforce has shrunk, from about 33 percent to just over 11 percent today. Plenty of new jobs were created during that time, and a lot of new wealth. But the new jobs have tended to be either high skill/high wage, or low skill/low wage. Jobs in the middle—the jobs that used to be available in manufacturing, with decent wages and benefits, enough to support a family—have been disappearing. These are the jobs that used to belong to union members.

Some people think the decline of organized labor means unions belong to the past, and have no role to play in the 21st century global economy. They say that workers are choosing not to join unions anymore. In reality, most workers would prefer to belong to unions if they could. But many are being prevented from joining.

Conservative state legislatures have passed laws attacking the rights of workers to form unions and bargain collectively—rights that workers fought for and protected for decades. In these states, thousands of workers and their allies have responded with protests, in some cases occupying state capitols for weeks at a time, or, as in Ohio, passing a state ballot measure overturning the anti-union law.

Why the protests? Why do workers organize? Because unions remain the best guarantee of economic protection and political advocacy for workers. But as unions shrink, fewer people know what unions are and what they do. And fewer remember what unions have to do with the prosperity of working people.

What is a Union?

A union is a group of workers who have organized themselves for mutual aid and collective action. It is a tool developed by and for working people, to provide them with a collective voice in their place of employment and in the broader society. Like any tool, it can be used well, badly, or not at all. Used properly, a union provides workers with a means to improve their lives in many ways.

Unions bring working people increased pay and benefits, and legal, legislative, and political remedies addressing the issues workers and their families care about: secure jobs and safe communities; necessary social services like public education, health care, and public safety; and a measure of support in old age through employee pension plans and advocacy for government programs such as Social Security and Medicare.

The reason why workers need unions boils down to this: employers have far more power than workers do, especially if workers have to negotiate with them over wages and working conditions as individuals. On the side of employers we find greater financial resources, favorable laws, and the power that comes from the ability to hire and fire people who need to work for a living. However kind or well-intentioned they might be as individual human beings, employers are motivated by maximizing profits in their businesses. All too often, that motivation overrides fair treatment of employees.

By forming unions, workers gain the power that comes with being part of a group created for collective action. As a group, workers can negotiate with their employers with greater chance of success than they can as individuals.

This is why Cesar Chavez became a union organizer. After many years attempting to address the poverty and powerlessness of California farm workers through community organizing, Chavez decided that a union was the most effective vehicle for achieving a better life for farm workers. His singular achievement was to build the first farm workers union that lasted more than a few years—the United Farm Workers of America. As a result, tens of thousands of farm workers enjoy higher salaries, have health care insurance and old age pensions, and experience a greater measure of safety on the job.

Every year Californians honor the memory of Chavez on his birthday, March 31. But he would have been the first to acknowledge that a union succeeds only through the combined action of its members. He may have been the leader in the effort to form the United Farm Workers, but he succeeded because he was joined by dozens, then hundreds, and finally thousands of other people aligned with that purpose.

How Do Workers Organize?

A union is formed when workers agree that they need the strength of numbers and a collective voice on the job. In most cases this means that they seek the assistance of an organizer from an already existing union. The organizer helps the workers to form a committee, which provides an effective way of reaching out to more workers until a majority has decided to establish a union in their workplace. This is the key to effective unionism: it is the result of the democratic process, the actions of workers themselves, and the backing of an organization with resources.

Once a majority of workers have indicated they want a union, the employer has the opportunity to recognize the organization as the official representative of the workers, and to sit down and negotiate a contract with them. This is known as collective bargaining. If the employer does not readily agree to recognize the union and bargain, then usually the workers move to an election. In the private sector this is overseen by the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB); in the public sector it is overseen by various agencies (for example, in California, New York, and other states, the Public Employment Relations Board, or PERB).

If a majority of those voting cast a ballot in favor of the union, and the employer does not file a challenge to the election results, then the union is certified as the exclusive collective bargaining agent for the workers. (An alternative to this method is called “card check,” in which the employer recognizes the union through a simple presentation of cards signed by a majority of workers indicating they want representation by the union.)

After a union has been elected by the workers and certified by the NLRB or a public sector labor agency, the law requires that the employer begin the collective bargaining process with the union. (This is how the process is supposed to work. The National Labor Relations Act, however, has become far less effective in safeguarding organizing and collective bargaining. We will discuss this topic in more depth on page 21.) Collective bargaining means worker representatives sitting down with management representatives to discuss and decide matters such as how much workers will be paid and how to resolve conflicts, when they arise, in a manner fair to everyone involved.

But a union is often much more than that. It is a measure of dignity for workers on the job. It is a kind of extended family, where workers take care of each other. It is a brotherhood or sisterhood; indeed, many unions, reaching back to their 19th or early 20th century origins, include the word “brotherhood” in their name, like the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. In other words, a union is a form of community.

The impact of unions—combined into the labor movement, or “organized labor”—on American society has been great. As a result of the successes of the labor movement, much of the nation’s working class was able to rise to achieve the “American Dream” of homeownership and a relatively comfortable and secure standard of living. Strong collective bargaining brought union members wage and benefit gains. But also, thanks to unions, many progressive laws protecting and enhancing the lives of all workers were passed. In this way, the positive effects of unions and the labor movement were not limited to their members, but spread throughout society.

George Stephenson.

Labor History

Unions have been around since shortly after the American Revolution. As the numbers of wage earners in the early republic grew, workers found they needed to form organizations to defend their common interests and advance their economic and political agendas. Emerging from older craft structures like guilds, by the mid-19th century working people were creating economic organizations (unions) and political organizations (workingmen's parties) to advocate for shorter workdays, better pay, and such social changes as free public education for all.

With the Industrial Revolution, conditions for American workers were dramatically transformed. After the Civil War, the widespread development of industrial manufacturing fueled a steady movement off the land in rural America to the cities, and the conversion of small farmers, skilled craftsmen, and urban artisans into workers in large-scale industries, where, after brief training, they tended machines. Even the language changed as this transformation occurred. Workers, reduced to a function in a workplace, became known as "hands."

This wasn't entirely a one-way process. A small number of master craftsmen were able to accumulate capital and move up to join the elite of industrial capitalists growing fabulously wealthy from these changes. But many more artisans, farmers, and village dwellers mourned the loss of their traditional ways of work and life.

Part of their unhappiness had to do with the demands of the industrial marketplace to standardize work processes and products. People were becoming less important than their function in the economic machinery. This was reflected in other problems, like the dangers to life and limb of industrial work. Many workers viewed these problems politically:

as industrial capital accumulated in the hands of the few, it concentrated power there as well, and eroded the democratic promise of the American Revolution for working people.

In 1877 workers acted collectively on a national basis for the first time. The great railroad strikes of that year demonstrated clearly to workers that the ability of “the monied interests”—corporations—to influence the course of events and to sway elected officials and the courts had to be matched by well-organized workers. Responding to the growing power of national corporations, local unions began to reach out to one another, forming national organizations as well.

Combined in the 1880s into the American Federation of Labor (AFL), these worker organizations sought “a fair day’s work for a fair day’s pay.” Their principal means to achieve their goals was collective bargaining, but political action played a major role, too. In the view of longtime AFL leader Samuel Gompers, it wasn’t appropriate for unions to align themselves with one or another political party. Instead, weighing each candidate and party on the basis of their actions on behalf of working people, labor should “reward its friends and punish its enemies.”

In this period rose the call for an “eight-hour day,” so that workers and their families might have some time to spend together, and celebrate life with leisure. The union members had a slogan: “Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, eight hours for what we will.” At a time when ten- and twelve-hour work days were common, and six- and even seven-day work weeks, the push for an eight-hour day was considered “radical” by employers and their anti-worker allies.

The fight for an eight-hour day occurred alongside others: campaigns for unemployment insurance, workers’ compensation, health and safety laws, child labor laws, and more. With these battles, the new unions strove to bring fairness and dignity to the lives of workers and their families and communities.

Throughout this history, workers struggled against restrictive laws and the efforts of business owners and their organizations to discredit trade unionism. Employers usually used one of two strategies. Either workers and their organizations were painted as somehow “un-American” or subversive for opposing business interests, or their attempt at collective action would be accused of seeking to “kill the goose that lays the golden egg,” damaging business and workers alike.

Due to this employer opposition, it wasn’t until 1935 that a federal law—the National Labor Relations Act—passed Congress, finally giving workers the right to form unions and engage in concerted activities on their own behalf. (The 1926 Railway Labor Act created a federal law providing for collective bargaining, but only for the railroad industry.) “Collective bargaining” between workers and their employers became the law of the land, and remains so today.

Passage of the NLRA is but one part of the labor history of the 1930s. For a decade or so, an extraordinarily militant working class faced the harsh conditions of the Great Depression with a creative variety of tactics, including the use of marches, demonstrations, strikes, political action, and, above all, industrial union organizing. This was the approach of a number of unions that broke away from the AFL to form the Congress of Industrial Organizations, or CIO. Their new method of organizing insisted on inviting everyone in a large industrial workplace to join the same union at the same time, instead of one craft at a time in different unions, which had been the approach of the AFL. As a result, the new industrial unions became a civil rights movement, because they organized everyone—whites and people of color, men and women, native-born and immigrants—at the same time.

Gaining millions of new members, the labor movement became the backbone of progressive politics in the nation. Unions anchored the coalition that elected Franklin D. Roosevelt president an unprecedented four terms.

Workers had to overcome often violent employer opposition to form unions and achieve workplace rights in the 1930s.

Conscious of the enormous upsurge in unionization and worker activism in the 1930s, Roosevelt signed legislation creating the “New Deal,” which consisted of several laws. In addition to the NLRA, the most important laws for workers included the Social Security Act, which put in place a guaranteed minimum level of income for workers in their retirement; the Unemployment Insurance Act, which supported unemployed workers while they looked for work; the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA); and the GI Bill.

The FLSA set a minimum wage, declared the standard workday to be eight hours, and the standard work week to be forty hours. It regulated child labor and mandated payment of time and a half (“overtime”) for work past the forty-hour week. More than any other law, the FLSA is what’s behind the bumper sticker that reads, “The labor movement: the folks that brought you the weekend.”

The FLSA passed over strident employer opposition. In testimony before Congress, one corporate spokesman claimed, “With the higher wages this law will force on business, it will be impossible for industry to offset costs.” Another warned, “We can see nothing but disaster resulting from this bill.” Despite the overheated rhetoric, the United States economy failed to collapse after the FLSA’s passage. Just the opposite occurred, in fact. Through higher wages and a shorter working day, consumer spending by millions of working families accelerated, fueling the growth of business and employment.

With these laws and policies, the New Deal addressed some of the most pressing problems that had been faced by workers for more than a century.

Although often identified in the public mind with President Roosevelt, the New Deal was not the work of one man. Rather, it was the direct result of events such as the San Francisco General Strike, factory occupations by workers, sit-down strikes, and industry-wide organizing, all of which established workers’ power as a social force to be reckoned with.

For many decades after the New Deal set a baseline, individual advancement for working people relied on the escalator of peaceful collective struggle through the labor movement. Unions bargained for their members, and proposed and lobbied for laws that could benefit all working people, such as advances in the minimum wage.

By the 1950s, the working class was becoming “middle class.” Through collective bargaining, health and retirement benefits became a standard part of the compensation employers paid to workers. The children of union members went to college in record numbers, thanks to the labor-supported GI Bill, which also provided loans to veterans to purchase homes. More workers than ever before could afford to own a home. The strength of organized labor enabled working people to rise from the economic uncertainties that had plagued them since the Industrial Revolution. Most workers and their families attained a level of comfort in the 1950s only dreamt of for generations.

Unions also lobbied for passage of Fair Employment Practices laws, which imposed penalties for discrimination in hiring and promotion due to race. When the FEP failed to pass Congress, unions and civil rights organizations worked together to pass state FEP laws. California's, for instance, passed in 1959, thanks to a coalition effort of unions, community organizations, and civil rights groups.

In this period, unions achieved their greatest membership. When the AFL and CIO merged in 1955, just over one-third of the working class was organized in unions. The NLRA, however, had left some workers outside its protections. The rights of public employees—workers employed by the federal, state, county, and city governments—along with farm workers, domestic workers, and a few other categories were not addressed by the NLRA due to lobbying by employer groups. These workers were forced to seek collective bargaining rights piecemeal, mostly through state legislation.

Beginning in the 1960s, public employees managed to achieve collective bargaining laws in about half the states. This became the fastest growing part of the labor movement. Nevertheless, more workers were still laboring in non-union workplaces than in unionized ones.

To meet the needs of all workers—without unions as well as within them—in this prosperous time, the labor movement worked with allies in Congress to expand the old age protection of Social Security to include health care. This became the Medicare program. At the opposite end of life, unions fought for the establishment of Head Start, to insure that children in poor families would have access to decent educational opportunities. Union support for the 1964 Civil Rights Act was key to its enactment. Organized labor achieved a powerful voice for workers in the United States' two-party political system, culminating in 1970 with the passage of the Occupational Safety and Health Act, establishing a federal agency to oversee enforcement of workplace health and safety standards.

Over time, however, business interests resumed their offensive against unions. Slowly, but with increasing success, large corporations and their political allies rolled back union gains.

By the 1980s, unions were on the defensive and in decline. Corporations were sending unionized jobs overseas in a globalizing economy to take advantage of cheap labor. Most new jobs in the United States were non-union, and the shrinking labor movement failed to organize much of the growing sectors of the economy, like high-tech, services, and retail.

The ability of workers to hold onto decent jobs was (and continues to be) hammered by “offshoring,” automation—which boosts productivity while eliminating jobs—and anti-worker, anti-union policies sometimes promoted by the very government agencies created to protect jobs and community standards of living. Union values and labor standards, for more than 30 years, have been and remain under constant attack.

Nonetheless, unions continued to win important victories. In the 1990s and early 21st century, dozens of cities and counties across the country passed “living wage” laws, thanks to vigorous efforts of unions and community allies. The familiar anti-worker arguments were resurrected and promoted through the mass media in well-funded campaigns by employers. In New York, facing a minimum wage increase to $7.15 per hour in 2004, the state director of the National Federation of Independent Business warned that the increase “could damage small business and other employers” as well as lead to layoffs.

But the dire predictions failed to match reality after the laws passed, just as in 1938 the economy was not stopped in its tracks by gains in worker purchasing power due to the FLSA. Economic research since 2000 has repeatedly found little to no impact on employment rates from either living wage ordinances or increases in minimum wages.

Today, despite the clear advantages offered by unions to working people, organized labor represents but 11.3 percent of the workforce. This is the lowest percentage of workers enrolled in unions since before the Great Depression, and the lowest of any industrialized economy in the world.

The Union Advantage

The record is clear. The power of collective bargaining supports higher wages and benefits, and prevents managers from viewing their workforce as little different from raw materials. Unionized workplaces have better safety and health conditions, and workers feel more confident that speaking their mind—a right guaranteed by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution outside the workplace—will not result in termination if the employer disagrees with what they have to say. To belong to a union brings important advantages to workers.

The median weekly earnings of a union worker outstrip those of a similar non-union worker by $956 to $841, taking into account factors such as education, experience, industry, race, and other important characteristics. This difference in pay adds up to almost $6,000 more per year for the union worker. The wage advantages for African American and Latino union members are even higher, demonstrating that a union contract can help to overcome institutional barriers due to discrimination.

While most workers and their employers pay a percentage of their wages into the Social Security fund, and can expect some income in their retirement, most retirees need other sources of income to adequately support them in old age. One of the most common forms of retirement income is an employer-provided pension. Unions negotiated these as “defined benefits” beginning in the 1940s, and the practice spread across the economy.

Defined benefit pensions, like Social Security, guarantee a fixed, predictable income, usually paid monthly from a collectively pooled fund. A form of “deferred compensation”—because workers agree to defer money that might otherwise go into wages into the retirement funds—retirement benefits also reveal a clear union advantage. Eighty-one percent of union members have access to defined benefit retirement pensions, while only 20 percent of non-union workers have access to them. Much more typical today for non-union employees are “defined contribution” plans like 401Ks, which consist of individual retirement accounts invested in the stock market or bonds. These are more vulnerable to the swings of the economy, exposing individuals to greater risks in retirement.

The dollar amount of difference measured between union and non-union retirement is equally significant. Considered as a part of hourly compensation, union workers receive over two dollars an hour more in retirement benefits than non-union members. Over the course of a working life, that can total tens of thousands of dollars.

Similarly, health benefits show a union difference. Most health care insurance coverage in the United States comes to people through their employers. Today, due to rapidly rising medical costs and enormous bureaucratic waste in the health insurance industry, employers are increasingly reluctant to fully fund health care coverage for individual workers, let alone their families. Without the protection of a collective bargaining agreement, non-union workers are more vulnerable to employer decisions to scale back or even eliminate employee health care coverage. Just over two-thirds of non-union workers today have access to some employment-based health coverage, and the percentage is declining year by year.

By contrast, although unions are under great pressure at the bargaining table to make concessions to employers and accept smaller health care benefits than in the past, union members are resisting and, thanks to their unions, retreating more slowly than in non-union workplaces.

By bargaining collectively, instead of as individuals, workers can offset the naturally stronger bargaining position of an employer.

Work, Money and Power: Unions in the 21st Century

Today, 95 percent of union workers still have access to employment-based health care coverage—a 26 percentage point difference compared to non-union workers. Union employers also provide more comprehensive health benefits at a lower cost to employees.

There are similar differences in favor of unionized over non-unionized workers in the areas of disability insurance and life insurance coverage. Unions offer a clear economic advantage to working people.

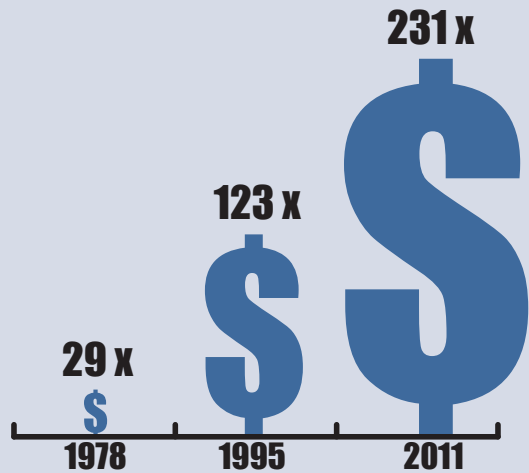

Non-economic factors sometimes mean just as much to working people as the dollars and cents. Workers want to be treated with dignity and with an appreciation for their efforts. Through collective bargaining and its protections, everyone must play by the same rules spelled out in the collective bargaining agreement, or “union contract”: workers don’t have to accept arbitrary actions of managers that might occur due to personality conflicts or a bad mood. A union counterbalances the power of management by providing workers with a say in determining work rules, and a voice in a peaceful appeal process—or “grievance procedure”—when there are disputes or disagreements. Such a voice is rare in non-union workplaces.

By bargaining collectively, instead of as individuals, workers can offset the naturally stronger bargaining position of an employer.

The Meaning of Labor's Decline for Working People

With such a clear set of economic advantages, why don't more workers belong to unions? In today's political environment, unions are often not allowed to function the way they are meant to. The laws designed to enable workers to form unions of their own choosing were passed many years ago. The workplace has changed, the economy has changed, and the society has changed. The laws have not kept up, and no longer provide the protections they were written to provide. A sustained, decades-long employer offensive has weakened unions, and as membership has declined, so has awareness of the benefits of unionism.

As a result, many of the problems that were eradicated when the labor movement was stronger have re-emerged.

Economic Disparities

When unions were stronger, employers were forced to understand that innovation and increasing market share were better ways to gain higher profits than doing so at the expense of workers' pay. In 1978, the salary of an average chief executive officer (CEO) of a top U.S. firm was 29 times higher than the wages of the average worker in that company. By 2011 it was 231 times higher. This is the highest pay differential of its kind in the world, and demonstrates an alarming trend: an unequal distribution of wealth worse than the United States has seen since the 1920s.

Besides the growing gap between the wealthiest class and working families, there are other signs of an economy tilting against people who work for a living. In the three decades following World War II, income growth in the United States could be charted as relatively equitable. The income of all groups rose at more or less the same rate. We are now living in a different era, and have been for the past quarter century, with growing numbers of poor people at the bottom, substantial numbers (but comparatively fewer) leading upper middle class lives, and a diminishing number of working families in the middle. The very rich remain few, but their share of the wealth is increasing dramatically.

More and more jobs can be found in low-paying areas of the economy. Fewer jobs are permanent, or offer health benefits, or retirement plans. The growth of part-time, temporary employment, referred to as "casual labor," is difficult for many people who would prefer to work full time, and need to in order to support their families. The largest private employer in the United States is now Walmart, where wages are so low that many workers are eligible for and receive government assistance. For instance, in 2005, 24 percent of Walmart workers had no health coverage or were enrolled in a public health program.

Recent studies reveal that more state welfare dollars to help the poor go to full-time workers than to part-time workers. This is because so many jobs now pay so poorly that even full-time workers are part of the “working poor”—people who are in the workforce but still cannot support their families. Of the five occupations projected to have the highest numbers of job opportunities through 2020, four are “very low” paying, averaging around $10 per hour.

The Return of Forced Labor

Most people in the United States think that slavery disappeared in the 19th century, with the end of the Civil War. As a matter of fact, today, here in the United States, it continues to exist, just as it does elsewhere in the world. This isn't the slavery of the Old South, of course. It looks different—when you can see it. Mostly it's hidden, behind the walls of old buildings, where law-breaking employers hold workers against their will for long hours and little pay; where minimum wage laws are but a rumor, and common sense health and safety rules—let alone laws—are ignored every moment of every day.

It is reliably estimated that more than 10,000 people in the United States are currently employed under conditions of forced labor—in restaurants, agriculture, garment factories, and other industries with a high demand for cheap workers. This is but the most extreme form of exploitation in the shadowy corners of the economy, where millions of workers toil under unsafe, often illegal conditions for poverty wages.

Failing Health Care Coverage

As union density declined, employment-based health coverage slid down a similar slope. In the early 1970s, seven out of ten non-elderly Americans had job-based health insurance. One benefit of widespread collective bargaining was that even non-union employers were pressured to match union-negotiated wage and benefit levels, or risk losing workers to the companies with unions and collective bargaining.

Over the four decades since then, the decay of union density was accompanied by a loss of health care coverage for enormous numbers of people. The declining number of unionized workplaces was not the only factor; all employers were facing sharply rising costs of health care and health insurance premiums. Between 2000 and 2011, the number of Americans with employment-based health care coverage declined on average by more than 1 million a year. By 2011 over 48 million people—almost one in every six people in the United States—had no health care coverage at all.

To address the problem, many unions advocated for creation of a single-payer health care system like Canada's, where health care delivery is paid for by the government through payroll taxes, similar to how Social Security is paid for here. But the health insurance industry refused to consider such a solution, and its lobbying power prevented serious consideration of single-payer. Recognizing this, unions swung their support behind the Affordable Care Act (ACA) proposed by President Barack Obama and passed by Congress in 2010. The ACA reversed the long-term decline in health coverage; through its provisions, health insurance coverage has now been extended to tens of millions of previously uninsured people.

Deteriorating Health and Safety Standards

The laws governing field sanitation in California agriculture are fairly strong—on paper. But when union safety committees are not present, no one is there, in the fields, to make sure those laws are enforced. There are still the laws, of course. But the farm safety and health inspectors employed by the state are able to look at just a few hundred farms per year. There are 81,500 farms in California. The state employs nowhere near enough officials to adequately inspect conditions for the overwhelming majority of workers. And on many of those farms, clean water for drinking and adequate numbers of toilets do not exist.

Such problems are by no means limited to agriculture. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) was created in 1970 because unions convinced Congress that the workers of the United States needed an agency devoted to overseeing their welfare in often dangerous workplaces. At its peak in 1980, federal OSHA employed 1,469 workplace inspectors. Today, in a workforce that has grown by nearly 30 million workers, the number of OSHA inspectors has been reduced to barely 1,000. It would take OSHA decades to inspect every workplace in the United States with 50 workers or more. The institution remains, but—like the National Labor Relations Board—without the ability to fully carry out its mission.

OSHA'S PROBLEM

Safety committees are common in unionized workplaces. They work with OSHA, but also maintain safety programs and carry out inspections on their own. Safety committees are not unknown in non-union workplaces, but they are far less common. Between the slashing of OSHA staff and lower union density, the safety of American workplaces and the health of American workers face daunting challenges.

Immigrant workers, in particular, are caught between the growth of the underground economy and the decline of health and safety standards. Millions of workers are in the United States illegally. The overwhelming majority take jobs native-born workers do not want. Unscrupulous employers exploit their fear of deportation by working them long hours without adequate health and safety conditions, often cheating them of their pay. If they complain, they are threatened with deportation.

Employer Coercion

According to labor scholar David Brody, it's time to scrap the NLRA and start over. He states bluntly, "The National Labor Relations Act, whose stated purpose and original effect was to encourage collective bargaining, has been hijacked by its natural enemies." Union organizers agree. Over half of all private sector union organizing campaigns face threats by management or owners to close the company if the union election is successful. During campaigns most employers require workers to attend ongoing anti-union meetings with their supervisor. Workers are typically harassed, threatened, disciplined, or fired if they openly support the union. Studies have found that workers are fired illegally in up to 34 percent of union election campaigns, and one out of five workers are fired for their union activities during a campaign.

Such threats and firings are illegal under the NLRA, which was originally enacted explicitly to "level the playing field" between workers and bosses. But over the decades, the Act has been amended so many times, and so many court decisions have modified the regulations, that little effective machinery remains to deter employers from engaging in such unfair and supposedly illegal activities. When the National Labor Relations Board finds a company has engaged in unfair labor practices—often after years of legal maneuvering—the only "remedy" might be that the company must post a notice admitting guilt, and promise not to do it again. Even if an employee is found to have been fired for legally protected activities such as union organizing, and the company is forced to hire her or him back with full back pay, years may have gone by, the other workers involved in the campaign might have moved on to new jobs, and the union will have to start all over again, with no guarantee that anything different would happen this time around.

This blatant culture of intimidation works quite effectively. The surprising thing is that workers keep trying, and their election win rate is over 60 percent. This is a testament not only to the courage of the workers who persist in the face of such obstacles, but to the continuing need for unions in the American workplace. Nonetheless, the number of elections has declined over the years, a clear sign of the effectiveness of the anti-union industry and illegal tactics arrayed against workers. More than half of all non-managerial working Americans want a union at their workplace; barely 11 percent have one.

The Need for Unions: Now, More Than Ever

Our national security is threatened as a result of the decline of unions. When collective bargaining was not just the law of the land on paper, but widely recognized as the best model for conflict resolution between workers and employers, it had a leveling effect on income distribution. Fewer people were very poor or very rich, and most working families were not only able to get by, but could expect to advance beyond their parents' economic position.

With collective bargaining losing ground, a less equitable economy has emerged. Employers are proposing casual labor—without benefits, without job security, without a secure retirement—as a desirable norm for everyone (except, of course, for themselves). Corporations exert a growing and almost unchecked power, even while corruption and enormous scandals have rocked Wall Street. An “every man for himself” mentality is being encouraged by those in power. Non-union workers are urged to feel envious of union members, and to resent them for their higher wages, better benefits, and comparatively better-off position.

Following the economic crash and Great Recession beginning in 2007, employer groups and Wall Street interests stepped up their attacks, funneling huge amounts of cash to anti-union propaganda efforts and to politicians willing to propose laws that roll back labor rights. This effort has resulted in several state legislatures reducing or eliminating rights to collective bargaining and union representation.

If corporate interests succeed in completely crippling unions, we should expect even greater concentrations of wealth and consequently greater concentrations of political power. This distorts the democratic process and tears at the social fabric holding our country together. Over time, without the stability between workers and employers that collective bargaining brings, we risk social upheaval of the kind we saw in the country in the 1930s, before the New Deal.

It doesn't have to be that way. Throughout history, workers have struggled to find an effective voice for their interests in the workplace and as citizens, often against well-funded, reactionary forces determined to prevent working people from taking their rightful place in society. Workers' organizations have thrived, fallen on hard times, and risen again. Some fights, like the one for the eight-hour day, have had to be waged again and again.

Recently, for instance, thanks to the Occupy Wall Street movement, the public is much more aware of issues relating to growing economic inequality and political attacks by the 1 percent on the 99 percent. The Occupy movement stimulated discussion and new activism on the part of union members, helping labor to respond to attacks by its enemies with broader community involvement and direct action tactics unseen for decades.

The union advantage continues to give workers an incentive to fight back against employers unwilling to pay decent wages, even with all the obstacles to organizing that workers face today. Nearly 17,000 Cingular workers have joined the Communications Workers of America (CWA) since 2004. In 2007, 12,000 home childcare workers joined the Service Employees International Union. In summer of 2011, 45,000 transportation security officers in airports across the country voted to be represented by the American Federation of Government Employees, and gained a first collective bargaining agreement the following year.

The higher standards of union workplaces and access through collective bargaining to fair, open rules for conflict resolution provide an important alternative for workers who wonder what they can do about unfair bosses. And union values, summed up in the slogan “an injury to one is an injury to all,” continue to inspire workers to seek improvement in their lives by trusting in the power gained when they stand together.
